In an ageing world, it is crucial to consider the role of preventative health interventions in supporting people to live more active, healthier lives for longer.

Preventing disease and limiting long-term impairment and the compounding impact of multiple diseases not only has positive health and wellbeing outcomes, but also wider economic ones.

To this end, ILC-UK are launching an international programme of work, which will draw out evidence to demonstrate the value of prevention and highlight case studies of effective prevention programmes and actions targeted at older people.

The workshop will give an overview of initial research findings, followed by a participatory discussion on the implications for global policymakers.
