Facilitated by:

MATTHEW CARROLL

ERA National Convenor

BELINDA CASH

AAG National Representative of the Student and Early Career Group

How does a researcher meet all their obligations these days?

By being savvy about the research game and productive with their time!

Such a researcher understands different types of professional language, and has a range of engagement strategies for their publications, grants, and external connections.

One of the key things in securing good results for your research work is getting to know what others' perspectives and priorities are, and whether you can productively align with them. This enables you to forge strong collaborative relationships within and across sectors, and presents you with efficient ways to build your research profile.

Tseen and Jonathan will draw on their combined experience as researchers, grant developers, research educators, and active research communicators to share practical strategies for being savvy about your research audiences and establishing an effective, well-rounded research career. By attending this seminar, attendees will know:

- How to differentiate audiences for their research,
- How to make the most of what they write, and
- The importance of staying true to their core research
